COPPER GIN

THE HISTORY OF COPPER POT

Copper pot still distilled gin has a rich history dating back to the 17th century, when Dutch and English distillers began experimenting with new methods of producing gin. During the 19th century, gin was considered a popular and affordable drink among the working class in Britain. However, it was also known for its poor quality as it was often made with cheap ingredients and additives that resulted in a harsh, unrefined taste. But as the century progressed, they introduced innovative distilling techniques such as the copper pot still which allowed them to produce a more refined and smooth-tasting gin. In the 19th century the production of well-made gin became a symbol of prestige and sophistication.

THE LONDON №1 COPPER GIN

In the 19th century, gin production underwent a significant transformation with the introduction of the copper pot still distillation technique. This method enabled distillers to produce a smoother and more refined spirit by allowing for greater control over the distillation process. Prior to this, gin was produced through a primitive distillation process that yielded a harsh, unrefined spirit. The introduction of copper pot still distillation marked a turning point in the history of gin, allowing this classic spirit to evolve into the smooth and refined spirit we know today. London copper gin pays tribute to that first copper pot disillation in 19th century, where it all started. The origin of London Dry gin.

TASTING NOTE

London copper is a gin made in the London Dry style. A top-quality gin that not only reflects the past but elevates that style to its highest possible expression. Because this gin is tribute to the past we wanted this to translate into its flavour and make the gin in the way it would have been made in the past but with a modern twist as well. On the nose it displays well-balanced aromas of juniper and citrus, with the latter, and particularly those of lemon and orange peel, particularly pronounced. As a result, the gin is very fragrant and distinctly fresh. It is mild and pleasant on the palate, with the citrus notes making it fresh and elegant, whilst the aftertaste displays subtle notes of juniper and delicate spices.
